This proposal includes a multidisciplinary approach of the biochemical and immunological characterization of animal viruses and the processes by which these viruses may become transformed into human tumors. Project I will examine the genetic variation in mouse virus isolates in order to relate them to human virus strains and to the genetic relatedness of the mouse to the human genome. In a mouse cell-free system, recombinant DNA molecules will be constructed in order to define cell-specific functions, to be used to study the genetic organization of the human cellular genome. Project II will extend these studies on the genetic variation of mouse viruses and the origin of the avian tumor viruses. A number of measures of genetic variation among animal viruses will be examined including gene sequences, mutation frequency, heteroduplex formation, and the influence of these variations on the specificity of replication in mice. The genetic organization of the avian tumor viruses will be determined, as well as the specificity of the gene products, and the relationship of the genetic information to the formation of genomic RNA. Project III will determine the virologic and immunologic basis for the cross-protection or interference reaction between non-identical mouse viruses by analyzing the biological and physical properties of the reactive agent(s). This project will be expanded to examine the nature of cross-reactive humoral and cellular immunity to mouse and human viruses. Efficacy of biopolymeric nanoparticles for systemic delivery of adrenomedullin in heart failure. Adrenomedullin (AM), a novel multifunctional peptide hormone, exerts vasodilatory, myocardial protective, diuretic, and natriuretic effects, and has been suggested to be a potential therapeutic agent for heart failure and myocardial infarction. However, the clinical potential of intravenously administered AM p21WAF1/Cip1 by interfering with its transcription. Most human papillomavirus (HPV) types are carcinogens and the E6 proteins of a subset of HPV types have transforming activity and can immortalize primary cells in vitro. We have previously shown that E6 proteins of HPV16 can inhibit cell growth by inducing the degradation of the p21(WAF1/Cip1) cell-cycle inhibitor (CCI) in transfected cells. In this paper, we characterize the E6-dependent degradation of p21(WAF1/Cip1) in more detail. We show that HPV16 E6 is an ubiquitin E3 ligase that targets p21(WAF1/Cip1) for degradation and that p21(WAF1/Cip1) is rapidly destroyed in E6-expressing cells. Degradation of p21(WAF1/Cip1) was inhibited by the proteasome inhibitor MG132 and by expression of a mutant E6 protein, E6(Tyr84-->Phe), which is unable to mediate ubiquitination and consequently sequesters the substrate from the proteasome. This degradation was also inhibited by microinjection of E6-antisense oligodeoxynucleotides into primary human cervical keratinocytes. We identify the E6-induced destruction of p21(WAF1/Cip1) as being dependent on the cellular ubiquitin E3 lig
